

Software education manager

Bryce's dedication to hands-on computer instruction was what led him into private industry in the first place. His first job at Qantel was as a curriculum developer and software instructor. Bryce travelled around North America and Europe teaching classes for all of Qantel's products – their operating system and system management tools, office automation software, business management software (report generation and business forecasting in particular), and their proprietary compiler language.

At first, Bryce was the only software instructor at Qantel. As the need for more classes grew with Qantel's growth, the company hired more instructors, the department became a profit center, and Bryce was promoted to manager of the group. Under his leadership, the department designed, implemented, and taught many new courses and opened 7 regional training centers around the country. One of Bryce's new responsibilities was "train the trainer," something he really enjoyed doing.

It was from this job that Bryce was tapped to be the Manager of Application Software Development at Qantel.
